A weekend in Applecross

Following on from a good time at the Donnington bash I arrived home mid day Sunday after a great ride down the Fosse Way with Jem and Ann Nicholls, takes me a bit out of my way but is a lot better than the M40. Took the gear off the bike and hung the tent to dry, checked the oil and added about 1/2 pint to bring it up to the full mark again. Checked the tyres (2) and the chain (1). Considered washing it but decided to leave that for another day. Thursday night packed the bike again ready for the early start to Applecross on Friday morning. The alarm woke me at 5:00 and after the last minute packing I headed north at 5:45. The aim was to meet Kev Feltoe from Norfolk at the services just north of Penrith around 11:00 this being just short of my half way mark. I actually arrived at 10:45 and Kev arrived less than 2 minutes behind! We had a leisurely lunch and then got under way again. We were making good time on the motorway until it runs out just north of Glasgow, average speeds dropped but it was a more interesting ride. The final section when you leave the 'main' road and head over the pass to Applecross is 11.3 miles and it consists of single track road with some passing places and a fair number of hairpin bends. From

The Bealach na Ba (Pass of the Cattle) rises to 2053ft in height from sea level in about five miles, and is the most spectacular pass in Scotland. It also provides some of the most challenging driving in the country. It is single track throughout and the warning signs at its foot, including one (which we think is unique in Scotland) deterring learner drivers, should be taken seriously.

We finally rolled into the Applecross camp site at a little before 20:00. That is 622 miles in 15 hours elapsed and 10:47 'on the bike'. After putting the tents up we headed down the hill to the sea front and the local pub where sustenance was consumed. We met up with Gino Rondelli and many others of the Tay valley branch along with a few from further afield and chatted until late. Normally when sat outside a pub in the evening you are reminded to go home when you cannot see the pint in front of you but when it is still daylight at 23:00 you need something else and eventually the long day got to me and we headed up the hill to our beds. On the Saturday morning we headed for breakfast at the campsite cafe and also to pay for the campsite for the Friday and Saturday nights. We were asked if we had booked, when we said no they replied that they were already over capacity and could not take any more, our response was that we were already pitched and had stayed one night; they then decided it was easier to just take the money rather than try to evict us! We all gathered at the pub at 10:30 for a group photo.

Gino told us he was thinking of going for a ride around the peninsula (I know it is not really a peninsula but look at the map, what would you call it) and if anybody else happened to be going the same way then they were welcome to join him

Strangely 22 bikes all went the same way. We had a great ride around some wonderful roads, lots of single track roads and hairpin bends. Stopped for the obligatory photo opportunities and ended up at the Lochcarron Hotel for a spot of lunch then continued on round back to the campsite and spent the rest of the day walking around the area and generally socialising.

In the evening the Tay Valley branch had laid on a band which set up just over the road from the pub, by late evening (and still daylight) just about the whole village / pub / post office / campsite staff / confused tourists plus the odd NOC member were in the road and getting on down to some very good music. After the third encore the band finally called it quits and we all headed off to bed. Sunday morning was yet another blue sky day, after a hearty full Scottish breakfast we slowly packed up and heading back south.

We both wanted to go 'over the road to Skye' so we headed west after Auchtertyre, over the bridge on onto Skye, we then headed south through Skye to the southern tip and took the ferry across to Mallaig. From there it was simply head south through Fort William, past Loch Lomond, down through the centre of Glasgow (slight navigation error) and back onto the Motorway. The aim was to stop somewhere south of Glasgow and we ended up at a place called Abington for the night. In the morning we had the first bit of weather that was anything other than excellent, this being fog. The ground was now damp and the midges were out in force, the first we had seen. Luckily we had stopped at Fort William on the way up and bought midge nets which we quickly donned before leaving the tents. Now it was just a push for home. Kev left the motorway at Penrith and we parted company. I finally arrived home sometime Monday afternoon, I really do not remember when. Total distance traveled 1317, MPG just over 60, dipstick still long enough to reach the oil. A wonderful long weekend with some of the best weather you could hope for, great roads, excellent company and a 100% reliable bike to ride. What more could you ask. The following weekend was the National at Bristol, but that story can wait until another day.

Thames Valley Branch at the Swallowfield Show

There was an error in the Passport for the NOC Jubilee Celebrations regarding Swallowfield Show on the Sunday and Monday (30th – 31st) of the August Bank Holiday weekend.
